NEW UNDERGRADUATE CURRICULA

(1) AEST: Integrative STEM Education Methods minor. Proposal for a minor teaching integrative learning approaches to be used at the elementary level, especially as they relate to science, technology, engineering, and math education.

A change in title was noted emphasizing the content is in education methods related to STEM rather than science and math content. Dr. Brusic noted that students electing this minor would already have content requirements met in their teaching certification area and this minor is meant to enhance pedagogy skills in making STEM content more relevant in the classroom. Concerns were voiced that content requirements for teacher candidates are too low for pedagogy to adequately address. Suggestions were made for higher minimum grades in math courses or additional lab requirements that could make students in the minor stronger in STEM content. Dr. Brusic indicated concerns that additional requirements would reduce student interest in the minor. The potential for helping early childhood teachers better see and engage students in STEM connections in learning was pointed out. It was noted that children’s engineering focuses on hands-on application of math and science skills to open-ended problems.

GCPRC

Dr. Mowrey shared GCPRC interest in faculty using course and curriculum review as an opportunity to identify potential collaborations in content overlap areas. She also distributed the annual listing of graduate faculty at Millersville.
